In her contribution prior to ratifying the presidential nominees, Minority Leader of Parliament, Hon. Dr. Bernadette Lahai said that she was happy to contribute to the debate, and described the nominees as competent Sierra Leoneans who would contribute to our democracy and development aspirations. “On the part of the justice system, she said that the judiciary had the responsibility to reward and punish lawbreakers; and praised the recent development in that sector such as gender based courts which sit on Saturdays, free legal aide, fast-track-commercial courts, and the filling of vacant positions in the judiciary recently. She also spoke about NATCOM, SALWACO and the Chief Electoral Commissioner and Chairman, NEC whose political lineage she said was very difficult to be discerned, and described him as a man who had professionally and independently carried himself”.

In his submission, the Majority Leader of Parliament, Hon. Ibrahim Bundu said that “he was not going to praise the nominees but rather challenge them to succeed in the various offices to which they had been nominated for national development as failure would not be entertained”; and furthered that failure was not an option for the new NEC as his predecessor had done well”. “He also challenged the judiciary to visibly look into unresolved and undocumented land disputes in the country that had resulted into the deaths of Sierra Leoneans”. He rounded by “imploing the nominees to succeed and not betray the confidence of the President by failing in those offices”.

According to the necessary provisions in the 1991 Constitution of Sierra Leone, nominees duly approved by Parliament would subscribe to an oath by the President before they could enter their official duties.
